

Typewriter Belonging to Abigail Scott Duniway

By Blickensderfer Typewriter Company, Stamford Connecticut

This portable Blickensderfer typewriter belonged to Abigail Scott Duniway, who doggedly worked for women's suffrage beginning in the 1870s. In 1912, voters finally passed an amendment to Oregon's constitution giving women the right to vote. Duniway's son, Clyde, gave the typewriter to the Oregon Historical Society in 1938.

In 1852, at the age of 17, Duniway traveled overland to Oregon Territory with her parents and siblings. She kept a journal of the trek, documenting the deaths of her mother and youngest brother on the Oregon Trail. Duniway, who married and had six children, wrote poetry and novels. Between 1871 and 1887, she published the New Northwest, a weekly feminist newspaper. She argued for equitable wages for women and contended that voting was a fundamental right being denied to women. To make suffrage less controversial, Duniway distanced her movement from prohibitionists and other groups that argued women voters would reform and purify society. One of the state's most powerful opponents to suffrage was Duniway's brother, Harvey W. Scott, editor of the Oregonian.

Duniway and other activists put a proposed amendment onto state-wide ballots five times, in 1884, 1900, 1906, 1908, and 1912. After the amendment passed in 1912, Duniway was among the first women in Oregon to register to vote statewide. She died in 1915, five years before Congress ratified a constitutional amendment giving women the right to vote nationwide.
